Swordsworn an act of hypocrisy, our agents have learned it was more an act of revenge. Apparently, not soon after his departure, Bannson blacklisted Schiavello, and several "security agents" raided his home and tormented his family in an effort to teach an object lesson in "employee loyalty." Now, as a combat chopper pilot for the Prince's Men, Schiavello takes great delight in returning the favor, with interest.

Commentary

Debuting in 3054, the Cavalry attack helicopter was part of a line of rapid relief/assault VTOL designs fielded by Michaelson Heavy Industries of Ruchbah. Though lightweight, this fast-moving chopper packs a heavy short-range punch and enough armor to weather a volley from some of the most powerful battlefield weapons commonly used today. Ideal for fast, hit-and-run strikes, the Cavalry became popular throughout the Inner Sphere, and is a familiar sight in The Republic Armed Forces today.

After a decade of solid sales to the Federated Suns military, Michaelson released the Cavalry for unlimited sale to all interested customers, including mercenaries and other private concerns. XX5169-78M is one such helicopter (albeit upgraded), and was initially built for use by DiNapoli Industries' corporate security forces, and was among some Bannson's Raiders units captured by the Swordsworn during a recent skirmish. Its current pilot, Dan Schiavello, nicknamed it "Stiletto."

Before the HPG network collapse, Dan Schiavello was a commercial cargo pilot for DiNapoli Industries, a major interstellar conglomerate that was absorbed by the massive corporate empire that is Bannson Universal, Unlimited. Though his own job was not endangered during the acquisition, Schiavello became increasingly concerned when several of his coworkers were "downsized." Eventually, he quit to protest his employer's recent policy changes and sudden shift toward military adventurism. While the latter reason would seem to make his decision to serve the
